Goal setting has become perhaps one of the most used and feed into and underpin movement towards the goal and away

GOAL SETTING: 5 KEY ELEMENTS TO BRING THEM TO LIFE foundational concepts in coaching. What is a goal and how is it useful? Anthony Grant (2012) describes a goal as being 'the purpose toward which an endeavour is directed; an objective or outcome'. In coaching, we look at goals as the desired endpoint or 'future perfect'. Regardless of description one thing is clear and consistent in the literature and research around goal setting - Goals play a key role in moving us from our existing state to a desired state. Goals play a key role in moving us from our existing state to a desired state. Locke and Latham (1990) developed Goal Setting Theory and have researched goals extensively, identifying 5 key elements that need to be in place for us to achieve our goals and highlighting how these 5 elements help to translate 'good intentions into great results'. Clarity: be clear about your goal and what you are trying to achieve. Write it down and think about how and when you will measure it. A clear goal can be measured. Challenge: set a challenging goal that will stretch you and spark your interest. Goals that are either too easy or too difficult can harm motivation and performance.

Commitment: ensure you are committed to the goal by aligning it to your values or important outcomes. Individuals will work harder towards a goal when they have had input in developing it. This instinctual buy-in increases the commitment level

Feedback: ask for feedback, so you can gauge your progress and adjust if needed. Feedback can come from others or from within. It can be a check-in point, to ascertain that you're heading in the right direction. It can allow you to adjust a goal or aspects of it to ensure your moving towards what is wanted. Task Complexity: take into account the complexity of the task, being realistic about time frames and achievability. Think about breaking complex tasks into smaller sub-goals if needed to reduce overwhelm. When done in a supportive, structured way, goal setting is effective and often critical to success. This is where coaching can be a vehicle to support others set goals through increasing self-awareness and responsibility. Goals give us a route to focus our attention on goal-relevant behaviour such as actions that from irrelevant tasks that are distracting. (Zimmerman, Bandura, & Martinez-Pons, 1992). How can we support goal setting in the workplace? Coaching is one key mechanism or strategy for helping this happen. It is a developmental conversation that is forward-focused as well as action-oriented. It is supported and underpinned by Self Determination Theory (Deci & Ryan), a macro theory of human motivation that looks at people's innate tendencies and psychological needs that feed into motivation. Coaching supports a sense of competency (achievement), a sense of autonomy (choice) and a sense of relatedness (connectivity). This interfaces beautifully with the tenants of Goal Setting Theory to support the movement towards goal setting and goal achievement.

SMALL THINGS - BIG IMPACT

Recently I reconnected with a client who I had not been in contact with for several months. As we discussed an upcoming project he thanked me for a suggestion I had made at our last meeting, describing how much difference it had made for him and his team. While I was delighted with this feedback I struggled to remember the discussion and just what I might have said that made such
